EYE CARE

Taking the strain out of corporate eye tests

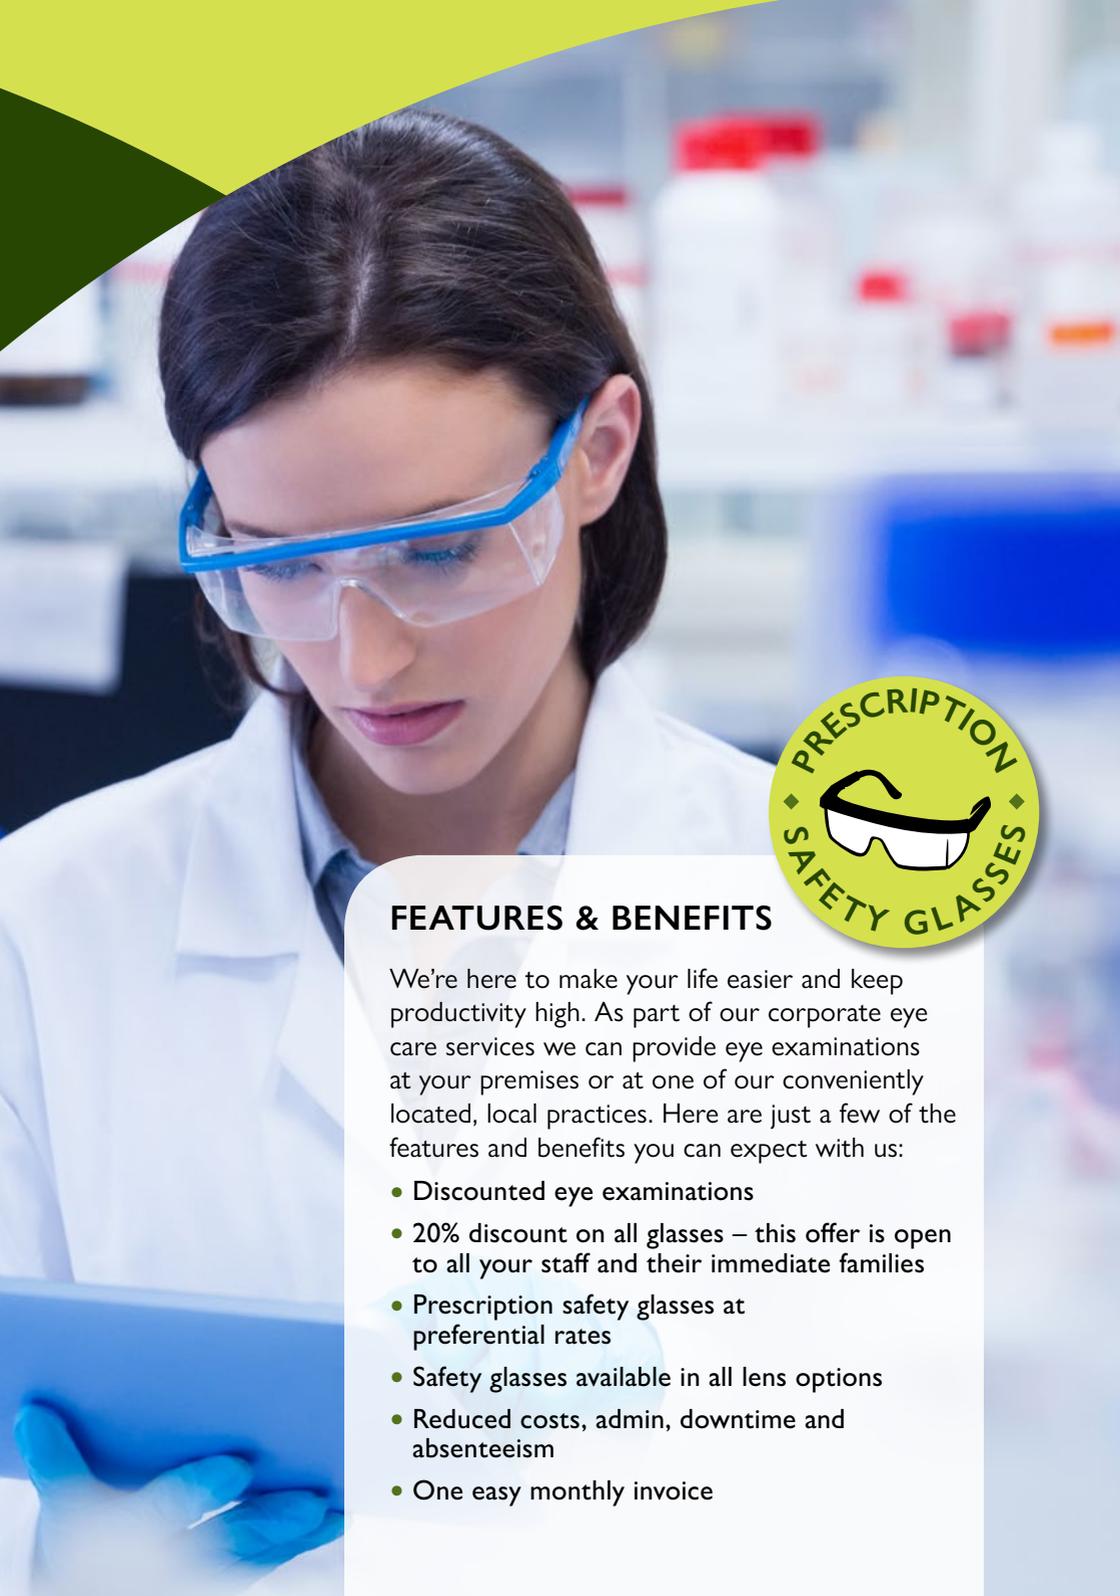

Employers that have the vision to look after their team's health and well-being benefit from an engaged, loyal and productive workforce. Taking care of your employees' eyes is part of this.

Regulations state that employers have a responsibility to provide personal protective equipment (PPE) where there is a risk to their staff's health and safety, and this includes providing safety glasses.

Employees should have a regular eye examination every one to two years and it's important that employees who wear glasses get prescription safety glasses. These are available in all lens types including varifocals and bifocals.

As well as checking vision, eye tests can detect early warning signs of serious conditions such as high blood pressure, glaucoma and diabetes.

Understanding the law

The Personal Protective Equipment (PPE) Regulations 2002 and the Personal Protective Equipment at Work Regulations 1992 (as amended) place a responsibility on employers to provide PPE where there is a risk to employees' health and safety, including the provision of safety glasses.

At Valli Opticians we can provide safety eyewear that fully conforms to BS EN166 specifications and are stamped with the British Standard Kitemark. The safety eyewear is designed to protect the eyes and help prevent serious accidents. The entitlement to eye care and corrective appliances is restricted to those employees whether permanent or temporary, full or part-time, who are required by the nature of their job to use safety eyewear.

The employer is free to negotiate terms of business with a particular firm. The employer can also specify that all tests and spectacles can be provided from this one firm.
